It has a dense coat of hair and a long tail which is particularly useful for balancing. The bandicoot is active both day and night, foraging for roots, insects and seeds in and around rainforest and tropical savannah areas. It digs a large hole in which it builds a nest and nests 3-5 young in the summer. In Australia, bandicoots live close to humans in cleared land and agricultural areas where they are often killed in traps. Because they are nocturnal they are also caught in nocturnal hunting. During the day, bandicoots are easily captured as they run or jump to escape from the predator. They are frequently trapped by hunters using a spear or bucket tied to a long stick. Maintaining natural habitats The International Union for Conservation of Nature (IUCN) considers the bandicoot to be least concern for its conservation status and a species of ‘least concern’ indicates that there are not believed to be any threats of immediate concern. The IUCN suggests that land clearing, burning and creation of new urban areas and large livestock farms pose the greatest threat to the bandicoot

Our approach consists in using nonparametric Bayes modeling of conditional density functions. We apply this approach to the problem of classifying data in different classes. Consequently, we model class conditional densities as mixture models (using Hidden Markov Model). The model parameters are learned from the data using a Bayes-Markov-chain Monte-Carlo method. We validate the proposed approach by extracting 3D shape models of cells from cell nuclei images. The method is then applied to a new problem for which no method is available in the literature. We demonstrate that our approach is particularly effective in
