Figure 12-4: Photoshop's history palette makes it easy to go back to previous editing steps. The history palette is also an important tool for creating and modifying images. It allows you to save various image steps in your history so that you don't have to redo any settings each time you work on the same image. Photoshop's history palette, shown in figure 12-4, lets you go back in your image editing session as far as you need to by using the up and down arrows on the right side of the palette. Clicking a step will also display the image that was in that step. You can also use the step forward/step backward buttons to move forward or backward in the history palette. If you need to undo any changes, click the last image that you just edited, and Photoshop will bring up a dialog box that allows you to undo your changes.

"I'm envious of my friends who live in the city, because I'm happy where I am," Steve Jobs told an interviewer in 2008. "I like it here, I feel comfortable." In December 1984, Apple co-founder Steve Jobs was interviewed by Katie Couric for an upcoming episode of the CBS show 60 Minutes (back when the show was known as 60 Minutes). During the interview, Jobs explained that Apple had designed a compact PC-like device called the Lisa (with Jobs' friend Steve Wozniak as chief engineer) that he felt was more capable than existing systems. Then Apple unveiled the Macintosh in January of 1985. Jobs called the Lisa "the ugliest, clunkiest thing you've ever seen" and the Macintosh "the most beautiful thing you've ever seen." You'd think Jobs would have seen the future by then, and have saved Apple from the disasters that would follow, from the disaster that would be the iPhone, the iPod, and the iPad, to the eventual death of the Macintosh. But no, he was still sitting there in 2008 when he dismissed Apple's past troubles. "I'm envious of my friends who live in the city, because I'm happy where I am," Jobs told Couric. "I like it here, I feel comfortable." Those words were reassuring to most Mac users, who refused to believe that Apple was preparing to ditch their favorite computer. Then Steve Jobs led Apple down the garden path with the iPhone. "It was pretty clear that they weren't making enough money with their Mac products," said Dean Cocking, a former Apple employee. "The whole problem was they couldn't make enough money with their Mac products and they were going to sell it all to the iPhone." That's actually pretty close to what happened. In 2007, Mac shipments plunged, down about 14 percent from the prior year, and the Mac even dropped off the charts of the top computer manufacturers. Apple shipped 4.2 million Macs. In 2008, that number was down to 3.6 million, a 6 percent decline, and has continued its downward trend ever since. Two years later, Apple shipped just 2.6 million Macs in 2010, and 2 million in 2011. In the first quarter of 2012, Apple shipped just 1.8 million Macs. This drop was supposed to be a temporary dip, before the company's iPod, iPhone, and iPad really gained traction and a change in
