The effects of thyrotropin-releasing hormone on sleep states and rapid eye movement sleep. Systemically administered TRH increases the total amount of time spent in non-rapid eye movement (NREM) sleep. In the present study, the effects of TRH on sleep patterns in two groups of Sprague-Dawley rats were assessed. Sleep was recorded by the use of EEG, EMG, and a TV monitor, and behavioral parameters were scored manually. Prior to TRH administration, the sleep patterns were characterized by a distinct NREM-REM cycle (NREM2-REM2) with extended NREM2 and REM2. TRH (20 micrograms/kg i.p. 2 hrs prior to sleep recording) decreased sleep in the first hour, but not in the second hour, of the recording, and increased the total sleep time and NREM2. TRH decreased power density (microV(2)) in the slow wave frequency band in the first hour, but not in the second hour of the recording, whereas it decreased power density in the spike frequency band in both the first and second hour. These results suggest that TRH has a biphasic effect on sleep architecture with suppressive effects on the first hour and stimulatory effects on the second./* * Geode GX video subsystem - description file * * Copyright (C) 2005 Thomas Moestl * * This code is released under the GNU GPL. */ #ifndef _GF_DESCRIPTION_H_ #define _GF_DES 3e33713323
