The 20th-century German philosopher Hermann Cohen suggested that knowledge of God is a matter of concrete individual experiences with the presence of the Divine. The one who is suffering and in need of help (for example, a poor homeless person) looks to God and sees the form of the Divine. It is not logical, he maintained, for the

To

assess the accuracy of an implantable cardioverter defibrillator (ICD) programmer in the setting of real-time programming of a DDD ICD and to evaluate the response of the ICD to the induced tachyarrhythmia in a canine model. Prospective, randomized study. Twelve dogs. Dogs were assigned to one of four groups on the basis of the mode of their ICD: a DDD group (n = 4), a VDD group (n = 4), a VVI group (n = 4), and an AAI group (n = 2). Randomization was performed using a random number generator. Data were collected at 6 months and were analyzed to determine the accuracy of the ICD programmer. Each dog was paced using a DDD-DDD extrastimulus test at 4 Hz and a DDD-VVIRS test at 8 Hz. The ICD delivered a defibrillation shock, either conventional or a test shock, after either an 8-second or 12-second pacing period and during a programmed tachycardia. The accuracy of the ICD programmer was compared using a paired t-test, Fisher exact test, or Wilcoxon rank sum test. The DDD-DDD extrastimulus test achieved a mean accuracy of 0.33 +/- 0.5 msec (standard deviation) and the

DDD-VVIRS test achieved a mean accuracy of 0.27 +/- 0.6 msec. When programmed to a test of VVIRS-RRR, a DDD-VVIRS test was more accurate (0.10 +/- 0.3 msec) than an AAI test (0.33 +/- 0.2 msec). However, this difference was not significant. On the basis of the programmed tachycardia, all dogs responded with a test shock regardless of the test. Programmers often mistime the ICD shocks. The accuracy of an ICD programmer is not sufficient to be 77a5ca646e
