More specifically, the invention relates to machine parts which are in operative engagement with the material web to modify the condition of the web. During use, a web material such as a paper or plastic material is subject to wear which reduces the useful life of the web material. Conventional handling of such a web material typically subjects the web material to frictional forces, mechanical forces, chemical forces or the like which cause damage to the web material. Accordingly, much effort has been expended in providing handling mechanisms for handling web materials which can be used in a gentle and non-aggressive manner, while minimizing the damage done to the web material. Machines for treating web material are known. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 5,636,614 to Kester, Jr. et al. discloses a machine for treating a web. The machine includes a wheel which has a plurality of magnets secured thereto. The magnets are arranged in a peripheral configuration so as to be positioned to interact with a stretched surface of the web to induce a magnetization of the web material. The magnets are arranged as a ring along an inner side of the wheel, with the peripheral configuration extending radially outwardly from the axis of rotation. Accordingly, the magnetized zones extend in a peripheral configuration that is generally radially inwardly from the rotation axis of the wheel. Unfortunately, the interaction of the peripheral configuration of the wheel magnets with the stretched web material generates a magnetic force which is concentrated radially inwardly from the rotation axis
