Per FIFA, this is the first in-game physics model to use motion capture data. “The new ‘HyperMotion’ engine collects data from real players playing a complete match in the motion capture suits worn by the players. This technology is derived directly from the dynamic and unpredictable movements players make on and off the ball during real matches,” the developers said in an official blog post. “We use this information as a foundation for the most accurate physics engine to date, incorporating player data directly into the physics modelling.”

The team added that the game engine also included: Proper locomotion for “run, jump, turn, slide and shoot” “An all-new interaction model - using forces and collision detection systems to get gameplay right,” A “multi-sport simulation-optimized template” using a complete sport such as soccer allows gamers to create teams, “New ball collision models” using the template, “FIFA 22 comes with a brand new player animation system,” the team said. It added, “This new system allows us to create an even higher level of authenticity and better match the visual fidelity of the player. We now have full sports-specific body animations for running, tackling, shooting and a new aerial style of play.” FIFA 22 is scheduled to launch on September 19. Stay tuned for more from us on the upcoming game.

Democrats once again threw their collective weight behind a resolution passed by the House this spring declaring water fluoridation a constitutional right — a measure that would force public water systems to add fluoride to the tap. The measure now moves to the Senate, where proponents hope it will once again pass and be sent on to the governor. If it reaches Gov. Cuomo’s desk, it would be the second time in two years that Democrats in Albany have succeeded in pushing through a resolution detailing water fluoridation, a program undertaken by most New York City water systems that’s criticized by some as a government intrusion into the right to choose what’s poured into our drinking water. The 193-to-4 vote this spring amounted to a major victory for Democrats who believe it’s best not to dispute the science around the benefits of ingesting fluoride, which the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention maintains
