Changing the blending mode of an adjustment layer Use a layer mask when you want to change the blending mode of an image adjustment layer, such as a brightness, contrast, or color adjustment layer. The mixing color that is applied to areas of the image will determine the resulting effect on the image. The blending mode, like the color settings in the main panel, is a tool that gives you total control over how the image is altered. Some blending modes have additional characteristics that are helpful when you're working with Photoshop layers. Here's a list of the blending modes available in Photoshop: * Normal — Normal blending mode (the default blending mode for brightening and lowering shadows) * Multiply — Multiplying (saturated) colors are removed from the image and replaced with new blended colors * Screen — Vivid colors are replaced with new blended colors based on the full range of the color in the area * Overlay — Overlapping colors are blended together and brought into the image * Hard Light — Removing or softening the light and colors of the area, so that the colors blend together as if the area was in the dark * Soft Light — Removing light and colors from the area so that the colors blend together as if the

Evaluation of anticancer drug resistance by inducing differentiation to antitumorigenic cell lines. A new in vitro test system for detection of anticancer drugs which induce differentiation to antitumorigenic cell lines has been developed. Cells which are resistant to antitumorigenic differentiation responses were induced to differentiate in the presence of the drug of interest, and the degree of differentiation was determined by quantitation of lipid and protein content as well as a known marker of tumorigenicity, c-fos. In this system, drugs which were previously shown to induce differentiation to pluripotent, nontumorigenic cell lines were correctly identified as being cytotoxic to normal cells while drugs which were not selective for normal cells were not identified as being toxic. Further, a novel anticancer agent, N-[2-(dimethylamino)ethyl]-5-(3-bromo-2-hydroxybenzyl)-6-hydroxynaphthalen-2-amine hydrobromide, was shown to be a potent inducer of differentiation to a pluripotent, nontumorigenic cell line. This agent was also significantly less potent in inducing differentiation to the tumorigenic cell line PC-12. These results suggest that this test system may be useful for the detection of drugs which select for cells with reduced tumorigenicity as an early criterion for potential anticancer activity. Q: Is my technique of burning Grease or soaps to start a fire logical? My mates and I are making camp and we found this weird method of starting a fire and it goes like this: Take a pot and fill it half way with water, cover it with a lid, cover the lid with heavy object and then remove the lid. Place one lit match in the pot on the bottom of the pot. Now the pot would explode and splash everything on fire and with the help of the splash, you start a huge fire. I am concerned this could be a dangerous method and especially if we are building a structure over it and with a little bit of wind, the fire could spread to the structure and burn it. What do you think about this? Is it safe to do this or it is a dangerous method? A: Your technique sounds quite reasonable. It should definitely be allowed. I didn't see anything dangerous about your method. I wonder if it was intentional, or if the other techniques used
