Q: Point of view of a reader with respect to a story line. I read a book which was written by a foreign writer in Russian. After reading the book I wanted to know what the writer thought about that story line. The writer wrote in the book about the story line and some of the decisions he made and I tried to tell the writer's point of view by drawing an analogy to a movie you go to watch. I realized that you do not know exactly which chapters the writer was thinking about when writing the book, but you are willing to accept his perspective if you like his writing style. Do you share that perspective? And if so, do you think the writer should be credited for writing that perspective?

A: When I read an author's comments in the book, I feel like I know what he meant to write and it is very helpful to me. An "overview" of the story is not the point of the story. Don't break the flow of the book. The aim of the book is to take you through a particular journey. The author's perspective reflects his/her involvement with the problem/theme of the book. It is not necessarily the truth. The author may not share your perspective or the reader's may be different from each other.

Squaraine dyes for environmental hydrogen sensing and data acquisition. Hydrogen has long been used as a fuel for combustion engines to propel vehicles and electricity for chemical synthesis. Hydrogen gas production and consumption is rapidly growing and is expected to rapidly grow in the future. For this reason, hydrogen sensing, capturing and detection systems in a number of applications have attracted significant research interest. This study presents a design and fabrication of a novel class of visible-near infrared (Vis-NIR) chelatable squaraine polymers (CSQPs) as sensors to measure the concentration of hydrogen gas in a variety of ambient conditions. Squaraine polymers constitute a very sensitive material to the presence of hydrogen gas. They have a photoluminescent (PL) emission in the visible and near infrared ranges that is significantly dependent on the presence of molecular oxygen, and hence can be used as an oxygen sensor. The PL emission of these polymers is also highly sensitive to the presence of hydrogen. This sensitivity makes them useful in measurement of molecular hydrogen or methanol and in sensing of hydrogen for different gas streams. In this study, we present the synthesis of a new class of
