National health geography is the study of how the spatial distribution of health services affects people's health. We performed this study to construct a dataset of activity centers for primary healthcare in Japan. The population in each activity center in 2003 was extracted from data published by the Ministry of Health, Labour and Welfare. Health service densities were calculated using the patient mix of various medical procedures. The MHLW Statistical Dataset was also extracted. The number of activity centers in this dataset was 9,804. The number of activity centers in the national dataset was 5,040 (more than 50% were in the Osaka and Tokyo metropolitan areas) and the coefficient of variation was 0.39. The geographical distribution of activity centers for primary healthcare was analyzed by gender. The difference was significant for women but not for men. There were more activity centers in wards with a higher proportion of people in a younger age group. This study demonstrated that the database constructed by the authors was based on information that was thought to be reliable. We consider that the database can be used for other health-related studies and health policies.
