Feb 21, 2020; 2 min read; M0116.mcd001ps2.wwe-smackdown-here-comes-the-pain.ps2.zip; Mcd001.ps2Danielle Cross, NBC News, April 6, 2014 A measure to give probationers more protections against searches and seizures when they're arrested for drug crimes failed in the Missouri Senate on Tuesday, but supporters vowed to keep working on it. The bill, S.B. 447, would have clarified that police officers must get a judge's approval before they could issue a probationer a special probation search warrant. Supporters said the special warrants, which are often called "drug check warrants," are used to search the homes of people who have been recently arrested, but are not a part of an investigation or pending case. But opponents said the measure was overly broad and argued that police officers already have the authority to seek such a warrant. In addition, opponents said the measure would force probation officers to be engaged in drug cases. Supporters argued that police should be able to obtain the warrants to search probationers, pointing out that "junkies" often conceal contraband 0cc13bf012
