[active]I've wanted to post this for quite some time now. I'm embarrassed to say I was unemployed for a week in late

2012 when I was laid off. It happened so quickly that I barely had time to come down with a case of the ‘what have I done?’ (that’s what we call it in the redneck south). A few years ago I was unemployed for over five months. The first eight months were painful but at least I knew I wasn’t a total financial wreck. Then I found myself pregnant. Since my husband of nearly 16 years had left me to marry someone else, I needed to find a job. I looked and looked but there just weren't any jobs available (and there really should have been). One day I was looking for an application to fill out when I came across a 'Help Wanted' sign on my door. It was for 'a bright and capable young man' and for the job of 'momma'. I couldn't believe what was happening. I called my work for the day and told them I was applying. They said no one would be hiring because the position they had open was going to have to be advertised. I called my brother to tell him what was happening. He was shocked. That was one of the few times I ever asked for his advice. We talked about how I might apply for other jobs and he was kind enough to use his connections to help me out. Like many women in these tough economic times, I was finding it difficult. I didn't have much money coming in or savings, so I was just praying for the best. I knew I couldn't just live off any job that came along, no matter how hard I looked. I went to the hospital to check on my baby. I hadn't been feeling right all day and I was concerned. Sure enough, when my
