What's new in Dying Flame:

Dead Hungry is a collection of interviews by Mehdi Mostajabi: a survey of those who have made the leap from one cultural generation to the next. It explores the way the generations are crossing the cultural divide. Dead Hungry: An Immigrant's Diary - Experiences of the 1998 Afghan Diaspora - Friday the 13th, 2002 - Wednesday the 25th, 2012 LE WRAP: In 1998, few in the West were aware of the ethnic, religious and linguistic diversity of the world beyond Europe. However, since the end of the Cold War, East-West relations have been warming, trade and commerce have grown, cultural exchanges are increasing, and people are less willing to excommunicate certain others. Speaking from his home in France (although he was born in Pakistan), Mehdi Mostajabi reflects on the day he left Kabul in 1998 to make a new life in Europe where he will eventually meet up with his two sons who he hopes will contribute to the melting pot of cultures in Europe. LE WRAP: Are the people of Afghanistan all extremists? Never? MEHDI MOSTAJABBI: I believe extremists are a dangerous minority. I would not like to see them doing anything. LE WRAP: Why is there so much 'desolation' in Afghanistan? MEHDI MOSTAJABBI: It has been a great land. It's a nice land, and it's a rich land - and it doesn't need to be 'developed' to be a good place. Also - in this country there are two kinds of people: the people who knew how to be modern and who are rich, and the people who are less fortunate and have less opportunities - and they don't have a vocabulary to explain the reasons for what has been going wrong. They blame the government for most of the problems. LE WRAP: In this respect, do you believe the culture of the Afghan people is still threatened by corruption? MEHDI MOSTAJABBI: Corruption is a great trial to this country. Historically this has been an Islamic country, and while some people are good Muslims, most people here are not; there are evil elements that have corrupted this country very unfortunately. There are two options: either it gets better very soon, or it will get worse than it has ever been. That's a serious problem,
