Dr. Sean Lee, Head of the Technical Performance team at EA Canada, discusses how that data will be used in this game. How did the team from EA come to this technology, and what has inspired you to develop it? We've been working on a long-term project with Real Madrid. The player's movements weren't captured in a sport game for a very long time until an amazing technology appeared: 24 cameras. It's a technology that has changed the world of video games over the past decade. We had the chance to work on FIFA 16 to improve the quality of the game's simulation. We had a lot of success and people liked the product. But it's when you have success it can be difficult to keep it up. It's more so at the top teams, where you have four or five or six big name players all of a sudden. Suddenly that's a huge squad, and it becomes very difficult to keep up with that. It's not an issue at the lower levels, when there's no team [Competition Mode] where you're facing players who wear a little jersey with two numbers on it, and they've been wearing it for a decade. In FIFA 16, I decided to go back to basics and said: "Let's look at reality." When we started to see the success of FIFA on Kinect, I remember thinking "What could we possibly do with this technology?" Could we get the player to express their personality? Could we get the player to express their personality? Could we give them more agility? Could we give them better footwork? That's where it started. Up until this point, FIFA simulation on Kinect was getting you in the right position and reacting to the input from you. There's a difference between being in the right position, and being able to have your movements be in sync with the position. We spent the last two to three years and a lot of time on that. With FIFA 22 we have created a movement engine that will work with a player's model, and it will learn the player's body well enough so that if a player stands up and starts running in a straight line, it will track that as they sprint, or it will track it as they jog. If a player starts taking it to the next level, it's actually going to learn the player's running style, and that's where our focus has gone. At that point, it

Featuring 37 international teams, and more than 1,000 unique animations, FIFA Football is the best football game ever made. FIFA Football '93 plays like a real game, showing an insane blend of passion and realism. So who's the best player in FIFA Football? FIFA Football '94 will throw that question back at you. Let the game decide. In FIFA Football, YOU decide who's the best. Team of the Year With Real Madrid and Barcelona vying for all the glory, FIFA Football '93 and '94 play out the top clash for the UEFA Champions League. With the arrival of Spanish top flight, the status of the player has been changed to Team of the Year. This feature not only shows the strength of each team in the league, but also enables you to select any player in the world and play as if you had him for the entirety of the tournament. The most prestigious title available to you as a manager is Team of the Year, the player you select will be based on your in-game match ratings from previous football seasons. So, if you select Messi, you will start off with the player in his absolute peak and play him over the course of the entire season as if he had been with you for the entire tournament. What makes Team of the Year even more authentic is the fact that you can only select one Team of the Year player per game. Even if you have the Champions League in your hands, Messi will always remain in his absolute peak form, enabling you to effectively use him in every game. Club Life The FA Premier League and UEFA Champions League are the biggest football leagues in the world.
