Individual and social predictors of health-related quality of life in women with eating disorders. The present study examined social predictors of health-related quality of life (HRQOL) and assessed whether social support interacted with social network characteristics and illness severity to predict HRQOL. A secondary analysis of a randomized controlled trial of a group-based employment support intervention in women with eating disorders (EDs) was conducted. Multilevel modeling was used to examine whether social support from family and friends, membership in a network of family and friends, ED-related illness severity, and participants' employment status, mediated the relationship between social support and HRQOL at baseline and at posttreatment. The study was conducted in the United States. Female (N=287) participants in a randomized controlled trial of a group-based employment support intervention for unemployed women with EDs. Women with EDs reported significantly lower HRQOL than normative US adults. At baseline, HRQOL was explained by the social support network characteristics. At posttreatment, HRQOL was explained by the network characteristics, having a partner, employment status, and illness severity. Significant support interactions were found between social support and illness severity for physical functioning, role-physical, bodily pain, general health, and mental health. Findings indicated that the social support network characteristics and employment status were important factors for improving HRQOL. Interaction between social support and illness severity for physical functioning, role-physical, bodily pain, general health, and mental health suggests that more support is needed in women with severe EDs. Research is needed on whether HRQOL of women with EDs can be improved by intervening on multiple factors at baseline and testing the effectiveness of group-based interventions that include HRQOL outcomes. Energy intake and body size in children. We examined whether differences in energy intake per kilogram of body weight exist across the age range of 1-18 years. To calculate total energy intake (TEI), intake was assessed using 3-day dietary records, and body size was measured using the age-adjusted body mass index (BMI) Z-score, derived from a World Health Organization growth chart. The data for 1,259 children and adolescents aged 1-18 years attending school in Srinagar, Kashmir, India in 2015-16 were collected
