Multilizer 6.[Trans-arterial chemo-embolization. First line treatment of hepatocellular carcinoma]. Hepatocellular carcinoma is associated with one of the highest mortality rates among tumours. Lately the application of "targeted therapy" has provided a novel and efficient approach to the treatment of unresectable or metastasised tumours. This article presents an account of a 63-year-old patient with hepatocellular carcinoma. Trans-arterial chemo-embolisation was applied, the aim of which was to control the intra-hepatic progression of the tumour. Percutaneous intervention under ultrasonographic control was performed in order to place the chemo-embolic agent into the hepatic artery. The treatment was well tolerated and resulted in partial response. We draw attention to the fact that during the course of the procedure, the patient could undergo both selective angiography and superselective chemoembolisation. Such an approach extends the therapeutic options available for the treatment of tumours, which is crucial in the management of patients suffering from hepatocellular carcinoma. Technical Field The disclosure relates to a light source system and a projector. Related Art In recent years, in projectors, light source systems that adopt a laser light source as a light source are used. For example, a light source system that includes a laser light source, an excitation light source, a first collimating optical system that collimates light emitted from the excitation light source and transmits the light to the laser light source, a second collimating optical system that collimates light emitted from the laser light source, and an emitting optical system that emits the collimated light to the outside is known as the light source system. In the light source system

The prevalence of Dirofilaria repens in two endemic areas in southern Italy. The free-living, lung-dwelling nematode Dirofilaria repens (Rhadinorhynchus repens) was analysed by scanning electron microscopy (SEM) and by the polymerase chain reaction (PCR) assay for its ribosomal DNA. The two methods revealed remarkable similarity: from 20 of 50 (40%) examined dogs, the nematode was recovered by both techniques; from 20 of the remaining 30 (66.6%) dogs, D. repens was detected only by PCR. In contrast, from 50 of 50 (100%) examined cats, the parasite was found only by SEM. The prevalence of D. repens infection in dogs was low and similar in the two endemic areas (35% in the Liguria Region, 37% in the Basilicata Region), but in cats the prevalence was high (60%) in the Basilicata Region only. Despite this,
