New Zealand has a rapidly growing population in the context of high net immigration; yet there is little understanding about the benefits and challenges of this. This article reports on a study which explored the views of 58 New Zealand-born New Zealand citizens with different life experiences of migration to Australia and the UK. Participants reported the benefits of global immigration and posited the potential impact of negative immigration policy on positive immigrant integration. The findings suggest that while there is currently considerable value placed on the diversity brought by immigration to New Zealand, there is a danger of neo-national identity formation among some participants.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a multiple effect audio amplifier or the like. 2. Description of the Prior Art Usually, a multiple effect audio amplifier is comprised of a headphone amplifier section, a distortion compensation circuit and a volume control section as principal constituent elements. The headphone amplifier section is used to drive headphones for reproducing a sound signal. The distortion compensation circuit is used to compensate for distortion of a sound signal outputted from the headphone amplifier section. The volume control section is used to adjust a volume of a sound signal outputted from the headphone amplifier section. The distortion compensation circuit for this multiple effect audio amplifier is conventionally constituted as a circuit formed by combination of a subtracting circuit, an integration circuit and the like. However, this conventional circuit is disadvantageous in the following points: (1) Because the integrator thereof has a limited time constant, an amount of the audio signal is limited. (2) Because an amount of the audio signal is limited, a time for repeating amplification and attenuation is limited, as a result, a time duration of the audio signal is limited. (3) A circuit becomes complicated because a number of
