the road? Is it time for a new charger? Sure, it's a plug and a socket, but you're going to need a new battery, too. Your smartphone is juiced up by a single battery, an endless supply of electricity running inside its case. But if you're tired of swapping that at the end of the day, chances are good that you need to replace it. It's a fast-growing trend that's getting easier to do, and a team of cell-phone makers—like the folks at Mophie and Zovi—have just released their latest products to save the day. Mophie, for example, puts its new Powerstation in the middle of your luggage, fully charged up, ready to go. Its Powerstation 45 packs enough juice to get you through the day, and it'll even charge iPhones and iPads. At $150, it's $20 more than a standard USB charger, but, Mophie says, it gets you twice the charging time. (Mophie also released a Powerstation 30 for $100 at the same time, and a Powerstation 15 for $50.) Inside the box for the Powerstation 45 is a small, black battery that's shaped like a hotel charging pad. To charge your phone, just put it on that pad and plug it in. The charging time varies from phone to phone, but Zovi says it'll take four hours to fully charge an iPhone 6s Plus. The Powerstation 45 is just the latest in a long line of Mophie products that turn a USB into a battery. The company was the first to release an iPhone battery case (it's still the most popular way to use one today) and it's made 10 of its own battery packs over the years. Mophie was also the first to popularize the idea of a "battery pack," a single charging brick with built-in battery for charging smartphones. It's a trick that's made things more convenient, but it's also made power a
