V2 0 B Rar - product description Pilgrims and Pagans Pilgrims and Pagans: Essays in the History of Religion is a book by the 19th century historian of religion, James Hastings, published in 1899. It analyzes the death and legacy of Neoplatonism in the fifth century, beginning at the time of Plato and concluding with the death of Plotinus in 270, eventually presenting it as one possible response to the events of the 4th century. Themes Overview In the essay, Hastings analyzes the reasons for the decline of Neoplatonism in the 5th century, which Hastings considers the result of a mixture of four causes: While the cause of the first one, which he calls "skepticism and materialism" (a general decline in Platonism's popularity which he attributes to the ethical beliefs of Christianity and skepticism), represents the only point of agreement between Hastings and what we now call Classical Antiquity, the cause of the second one, "the discovery of the earth's rotation", represents disagreement, for Hastings ascribes the cause to Hipparchus' measurement of the circumference of the earth and its relation to Ptolemy's "copernican" theory of stellar movements. The third cause, which he refers to as "the growth of luxury" (which he sees as being both a cause of decline and a continuation of the first), is the reason to which he ascribes the fourth cause: the discovery of the cause of human mortality. He proposes that, with the advent of Christianity, the ancient world was no longer unified by the need to create a harmony among its various inhabitants, and thus was divided by it. Neoplatonism began to decline as the world fractured, and was gradually replaced by Christianity as people sought to understand a more harmonious and unified reality. A letter that Hastings wrote to W. S. Lilly in January 1891 supports Hastings's opinion of the latter: Critical reception Ancient sources Plutarch's The Parallels is "peculiarly" appropriate as an introduction to Hastings' own work, since he writes that he "purposely" includes those works in his discussion which are not specifically about Neoplatonism

STOCKHOLM: The European Union and Japan signed a global free trade deal on Monday that will replace the EU-US trade agreement, German daily newspaper, Frankfurter Rundschau, reports on its website. Trade Minister Jyrki Katainen attended the signing ceremony in Brussels where the signature deal was heralded as a step forward in the EU-Japan trade negotiations. The EU said the deal would include "super trade" with Japan and the EU, while it would have a positive impact on intra-EU commerce. "To speed up trade flows, the European Union and Japan are signing today the first free trade agreement in the world that shall cover services, health, higher education and technical assistance," Katainen said in a statement. "That means zero tariffs on products and zero protectionism." Both Katainen and Japanese Foreign Minister, Taro Aso, said the deal was part of the EU's wide-ranging plans to replace the 10-year-old EU-US trade agreement. The announcement, which will impact two-way trade between the two most important economic powers in the world, will create better access to each other's markets and remove obstacles for foreign suppliers. A press release from the EU-Japan trade commission, EUFIC, said that the new deal would build on the existing free trade agreement signed in June and further improve conditions for EU companies abroad. The new agreement will "promote the integration of Japan into the world economy" but was not a "free trade agreement", Katainen said. European Trade Commissioner, Karel De Gucht, who attended the signing ceremony, said the new deal would not only benefit EU companies and consumers but Japan as well. "It's good news for European business as well as for Japanese business and consumers," De Gucht said. "In the wake of the US-Japan economic agreement, we can now move on to negotiations with the EU," he added. From 2015, the EU and Japan will be the world's two largest economies and the single trade agreement will be replaced by the new double-accord. The double
