Dopamine D1/D2 receptor densities in the nucleus accumbens and the anterior putamen in patients with untreated schizophrenia. The density of D1 and D2 dopamine receptors was determined in the nucleus accumbens (NA) and the anterior putamen (AP) in nine untreated schizophrenic patients (six men and three women, aged 24-42 years) and nine matched controls (six men and three women, aged 23-35 years). The D1 receptor density was found to be significantly decreased (30%) and the D2 receptor density significantly increased (58%) in the NA of schizophrenic patients compared to controls. The D1 and D2 receptor densities in the AP were not significantly different between the two groups. There was a significant correlation between D1 and D2 receptor densities in the NA of both controls and schizophrenic patients. These results indicate a reduction of D1 receptors in the NA of schizophrenic patients. It is suggested that changes in NA D1 and D2 receptor densities may have clinical significance in the pathogenesis of schizophrenia.
